At last count, I've worked on over 60 visitors' centers and museums. They range from a small regional museum in the Northwest to large visitors' centers on the other side of the world. They involve subject matters as diverse as the unique stories each one has to tell, but they all share the common goal of informing, enlightening and involving the public.

Experiencing a good exhibit is like interacting with a really good teacher. After you're through with an interesting exchange, you remember things; something deep inside you shifts, and in a little way, you're never quite the same.

Steamboat Bertrand Museum

U.S. Dept. of the Interior, Fish and Wildlife Service

On April 1, 1865, time stopped for a steamboat on a stretch of the untamed Missouri River. Over 100 years later, the site of its sinking was uncovered. The boat's treasure trove of artifacts and the fascinating stories behind them are now told to hundreds of thousands of visitors each year.

Fremont Indian State Park

Utah Division Of Parks and Recreation

A year after the discovery of the largest pre-historic Fremont Indian village ever found, an experienced interpretive and design team was assembled to tell the story behind what was uncovered. The exhibits provide the visitor with a view into the far different world of this land's ancient and mysterious inhabitants.

Asir National Park

Kingdom of Saudi Arabia and U.S. Park Service

Overcoming very different cultural and environmental considerations, a complex network of experts was assembled together under the shared vision of preserving and explaining a very special place. Saudi Arabia's first national park is located in the mountainous southwestern part of the Arabian peninsula, ranging from the coral reefs of the Red Sea to 10,000-foot peaks along the rim of the Great Rift Escarpment.

Bullfrog Visitor Center

National Park Service

Lake Powell is a lake formed behind Glen Canyon Dam in the heart of the West's most scenic area. In the middle of the desert, this lake, with more coastline than all of California, is a magnet for travelers from around the world. In a recently completed visitors' center near the heavily-used Bullfrog Marina, this extensive exhibit interprets the region's unique natural history.
